

"Did I say that? I wouldn't say that," Tisket said. She put her hands on the wall across from the baron's desk, directly opposite the vent she entered through, and started running them along the textured paint, her shrewd face drawn in concentration. The wall began rippling under hands, then a glass and mahogany door appeared.

Tisket swung the door open, and the three of the peered inside. The room looked like an executive washroom, with marble floors and countertops, plush but not ostentatious. Maarika frowned and pushed at her headset with the heel of her palm.

"It's just a bathroom," she said in frustration. "My father has one just like it in his office."

"Lady Maarika, I don't believe your father's washroom has a conspicuous electrical closet, however," Ranveig said, pointing at another door, this one at the far end of the washroom. Even staring directly at it, Tisket still had a difficult time really seeing the door.

"Did you find the vault?" Gibraltar asked through their comms. "I hope so. The motion sensors we set up two floors down just tripped. I think you're about to have company."

"My lady, you and Tisket tend to the vault, and I will assess the situation and engage with any security," Ranveig said, already unholstering her axe and heaving it up with a powerful arm. Her long braid flapped against her back as she sprinted towards the baron's office door.

"Ranveig, keep us apprised of numbers. G, watch those motion sensors. If we get movement on another floor, you let me know," Dolaidh rattled off into their ears. "Maarika, Tisket, get into that vault. We're hitting the end of our time window here."

Maarika rested her hand on the second door. It immediately slid into the wall, revealing a matte silver wall behind it, boasting a large electrical panel with a keypad, what looked like a thumbprint scanner, and probably some kind of device to offer the blood of Sevastyan's enemies' firstborn children. As she ran her fingertips lovingly over the keypad, Maarika's face lit up, a faint silver light glittering around her, and Tisket staggered back involuntarily at the beauty of it. In the hallway outside the baron's office, Ranveig let out a war cry and the sounds of battle began echoing through the room.