

tor), though the changeling may still weave in Prop or Nature as well if she desires.

Done Deal can only sanctify formal agreements between the changeling and other characters, or between other characters who have agreed that the changeling should act as a witness or notary to the contract. Casual agreements (“sure, I’ll pick up the check” or “I’ll try to make it to your little-league game”) aren’t valid targets for Done Deal — at bare minimum, a formal promise is required.

When an individual breaks an agreement bound by Done Deal, they normally suffer a number of automatic botches equal to the successes on the cantrip’s activation roll, which the Storyteller doles out at the most dramatically appropriate and poetically ironic moments. If the oath was sanctified around a place (with the Scene Realm), that place becomes the oathbreaker’s bane; for a number of scenes equal to the successes on the cantrip’s activation roll, while the oathbreaker is in the binding location, 1s, 2s, and 3s all subtract successes and can create botches. (These scenes are only ‘spent’ when the oathbreaker is present; one cannot wait out a Contract curse by any means save total avoidance of the baneful ground.) If the oath was sanctified around an object, that object becomes the oathbreaker’s bane. All attempts by the oathbreaker to use it suffer the same penalty as with cursed ground, and any attempts to use the object against the oathbreaker gain a number of bonus dice equal to the successes on the activation roll.

Type: Chimerical

☞☞ liar’s bell

The selkie looks up from her motley’s conversation, suddenly heartsick. Somewhere, she knows, her husband has just betrayed her.

She rises without a word, and before her friends can ask what’s wrong, she is gone.

As the changeling’s mastery over Contracts grows, she becomes highly attuned to breaches in the binding Glamour she laid down. She becomes instantly aware whenever someone has broken a contract